Unit 7 ART

主题素养积累

She is widely seen as proof that good looks can last forever. But at nearly 500 years of age, time is catching up with Mona Lisa.

The health of the famous picture, painted by Leonardo da Vinci in the early 16th century, is getting worse by the year, according to the Louvre Museum (卢浮宫博物馆) where it is housed.

"The thin, wooden panel on which Mona Lisa is painted in oil has changed shape since experts checked it," the museum said. Visitors have noticed changes but repairing the world's most famous painting is not easy. Experts are not sure about the materials the Italian artist used and their current chemical state.

Nearly 6 million people go to see Mona Lisa every year, many attracted by the mystery of her smile. "It is very interesting that when you're not looking at her, she seems to be smiling, and then you look at her and she stops," said Professor Margaret Livingstone of Harvard University. "It's because direct vision (视觉) is excellent at picking up the detail, but less suited to looking at shadows. Da Vinci painted the smile in shadows."

However, the actual history of Mona Lisa is just as mysterious as the smile. Da Vinci himself planned to return it to Italy. The painting was sent back to France two years later. After decades, the French hid the painting in small towns to keep it out of the hands of German forces.

The Palisades Fire in Los Angeles burned Charlotte Tragos' home to the ground. "It was a pretty special and unique house," says Tragos, who escaped with her parents, her younger sister and their three dogs when the fire broke out on January 7, 2025.

A few days after the fire started, a friend shared with her a video of a Los Angeles artist offering to create, for free, watercolour paintings of people's homes before they were burned down. Tragos reached out to the artist, Jordan Heber, asking if she could do Tragos' childhood home. "I wanted to do it as a surprise to my parents, who are extremely busy right now," she says. Tragos sent a photo to Heber, who completed a painting of Tragos' home in just three days.

"Our homes are so much more than these physical, standing things that we keep our belongings in," says Heber, who lives in Santa Monica. "It's an incredible honour to create these lasting respects to the places that carried so much life and memory." Tragos says she will forever be grateful to Heber. "It means the world," she says. "We're in a position where we have nothing, and anything like that, especially pieces that honour what the house meant to us, is really inspiring."

Behind this deeply comforting gift, though, lies the heartfelt motivation (动力) that drove Heber to act when the wildfires struck. A friend sent her a post by another local artist offering to draw people's homes at no charge, and Heber was inspired. "This will be my way to help people," said Heber. Shortly after she posted her offer on social media, requests started coming in. Heber has created more than 25 paintings, including one for Jeremy Wineberg, whose home in Pacific Palisades was destroyed.

"We told her our story, and she so kindly and lovingly made such a beautiful memory that looks exactly as if it was a photograph," says Wineberg. "We're going to frame it and put it in our new home eventually." Heber is glad that people find her paintings meaningful, saying, "Hopefully it inspires others to use their talents to help people."

( )1. Which statement about Jordan Heber's free painting service is TRUE?

A. She designed the service after seeing the special and unique house.

B. People asked her to paint the houses they moved into after the fire.

C. She has drawn over 25 house paintings since advertising her service online.

D. Her painting service was first offered to the people affected by the Palisades Fire.

( )2. What motivated Jordan Heber to provide free paintings for fire victims?

A. The urgent need from fire victims spread on social media.

B. The kind act of another local artist who offered free drawings.

C. The hope of making her painting skills better known to the public.

D. The extra time she had after the wildfires disturbed her daily work.

( )3. What kind of person is Jordan Heber according to the passage?

A. Generous and reliable.

B. Modest and determined.

C. Talented and imaginative.

D. Warm-hearted and artistic.

[2024·北京第四中学高一期中]

Art comes in two main categories: realistic and abstract. Realistic art aims to show real-life scenes, people, and objects exactly as they appear. It involves paying close attention to details and making things look like photographs. 1. _____. It's more about expressing feelings, emotions, and ideas.

Realistic art is easy to understand. Viewers can easily recognize what is portrayed. Take the Mona Lisa for example—it's a realistic painting of a lady with a mysterious smile. 2. _____, helping us to learn about the past.

Unlike realistic art, abstract art is more about being creative. 3. _____. They use shapes, colours and patterns to express feelings and ideas. Abstract art means different things to different people. Some people enjoy trying to figure out what the artwork conveys.

4. _____. Realistic art needs precision in drawing or sculpting to make things look real. Abstract art requires imagination to use shapes and colours in new ways. Many artists are skilled in both. They create realistic pieces to demonstrate their technical skills and abstract ones to display their creativity.

As for personal preference, some people prefer the clear stories of realistic art while others are attracted to the mystery of abstract art, interpreting meanings in the shapes and forms. Together, the two kinds of art make the art world diverse and engaging. 5. _____.

A. Both types of art take skills to make

B. Photographs preserve faces of folks from long ago

C. Grasping abstract art demands more artistic training

D. Both ways of creating art have their own value and beauty

E. In contrast, abstract art focuses less on realistic appearances

F. Artworks like this tell stories about history and everyday life

G. Artists have the freedom to go beyond real-life representations

At the age of 12, I withdrew into my bedroom with my guitar. I had neither musical talent—many __1__ music lessons had proved that—nor musical training. My fingers ached as I tried to press down on the strings without making terrible noise. However, I worked my way hard through 2-, 3- and even 5-chord (和弦) songs and discovered the __2__ thrills of these musical notes. No one __3__ me to do this. I did this myself and of my own free will for a week, and the sense of happiness—true happiness __4__ in absorption in something—has stayed with me. Fifty years later, that week's self-directed practice became a model and foundation for almost every meaningful thing I have done since. It makes me understand the difference between achievement and accomplishment.

The world favours achievement while __5__ accomplishment. The former is the completion of the task from the outside—the __6__ being a path to the next task. The latter is the end point of an activity we have chosen, whose bonus is the sudden __7__ of happiness.

The seeking of accomplishment always amazes people. I learned so long ago in that __8__ week that simply lifting one finger from the guitar's C chord, you should get the most moving __9__ in tune. I didn't know then it was a major 7th chord, a favourite of some masters'. I just __10__ accomplishment. That's real human "achievement".

Philosophers have been asking questions about the value of art for a long time. The aesthetic theory argues that the value of art lies both in its emotional power and in helping us better understand ourselves. 1. _____ This is where Pablo Tinio's "Mirror Model of Art" comes in. According to this model, the processes of art-making and art-viewing are inherently connected.

2. _____ The first stage is called initialization. It includes processes for generating and exploring ideas that motivate the work. The second stage, expansion and adaptation, involves the development and refinement of the early structure. In the third stage, enhancements and modifications (改进) are typically applied to the surface layer of the artwork.

In turn, the process of art appreciation involves movement along these three stages. Viewers first perceive and interact with the surface features of the artwork. 3. _____ This is followed by more deliberate processing of the artworks about their content, structure, and style. In the last stage, people interpret the artwork and come to understand it in relation to themselves.

Recently, Delaram Farzanfar and his colleagues tested Tinio's "Mirror Model of Art" with a meta-analysis of fMRI studies. The analysis focused on participants engaging in creative production—or aesthetic appreciation—for less than 30 seconds, allowing one to gather a picture of what is happening in the brain in the very early stages of those processes. The results revealed that creative production and aesthetic appreciation share many of the same neural structures, suggesting similarities between these two activities. Artists are inspired by what they see in the world around them and draw on personal experiences to create their work. 4. _____

As noted by the experts, creativity can be viewed as the source of cultural forms, whereas aesthetics is the evaluation framework for the products of creativity. 5. _____ Next time you're at the museum, remember that your aesthetic judgements of artworks might matter more than you thought they did.

A. Processes of art creation proceed along three stages.

B. Then memories about the artworks are activated automatically.

C. Similarly, art moves us emotionally, and it is a source of meaning.

D. In other words, as we reflect on art, we learn more about ourselves or the world.

E. It is easy to see the association between the creation and appreciation of visual art.

F. Viewers perceive art as objects and interpret what they see with personal memories.

G. Therefore, aesthetic appreciation becomes how consumers judge the appeal of creative products.

A [2026·北京广渠门中学高一期中]

In a world of music streaming services, access to almost any song is just a few clicks away. Yet, the live performance lives on. People still fill sweaty basements, muddy fields and gilded concert halls to hear their favourite musicians play. And now neuroscientists might know why—live music engages the brain's emotion centres more than its recorded counterpart.

Concerts are immersive social experiences in which people listen to and feel the music together through crescendos, key changes and rhythmic drops. Moreover, they are dynamic—artists can adapt their playing according to the crowd's reaction.

It was this last difference that led neuroscientists, based at the universities of Zurich and Oslo, to study the brain responses of people listening to music. In the "live" experiment, participants lay in an MRI scanner listening to the music through earphones, while a pianist was positioned outside the room. The pianist was shown the participant's real-time brain activity as a form of feedback. In the recorded condition, participants listened to pre-recorded versions of the same tunes.

The scientists were interested in how live music affected the areas of the brain responsible for processing emotions, particularly the amygdala, an area deep inside the brain. The results, just published in the journal PNAS, revealed that live music had a significantly greater emotional impact. Whether the music conveyed happiness or sadness, dynamic live performances led to increased activity not only in the amygdala but also other parts of the brain's emotion processing network. The researchers also found that participants' brain activity tracked the acoustic (声学的) features of the music, like tempo and pitch, far more closely when it was played live.

While the study didn't fully recreate the live concert experience, the findings suggest that artists' ability to adjust their performance in real time contributes to the emotional resonance (共鸣) of live music. Some musical acts now attempt to recreate live concerts, such as ABBA Voyage, an immersive pre-recorded VR concert, but without artists' capacity to read audience's mood and respond accordingly, it will never quite match the real thing.

( )1. Why do people choose live shows over streaming music?

A. To enjoy the unique live atmosphere.

B. To meet favourite musicians in person.

C. To escape the boredom of recorded music.

D. To acquire a stronger emotional connection.

( )2. What did the PNAS study find about live music?

A. It affected only the amygdala of the brain.

B. It generated intense brain responses to sound elements.

C. It had a weaker emotional effect than pre-recorded music.

D. It strengthened emotions more in sad tunes than happy ones.

( )3. What can be a suitable title for the text?

A. How music consumption evolved in the digital age

B. Why your brain prefers live concerts to streaming songs

C. Live music vs. recorded music: a neuroscientific perspective

D. ABBA Voyage: redefining the future of virtual concert experiences

B [2026·北京第八十中学高一月考]

Art and science are often seen as distinct approaches to understanding the world. Artists ask subjective, open-ended questions. Scientists seek a common, objective view of reality.

Cosmic Titans: Art, Science and the Quantum (量子) Universe, an absorbing exhibition in the UK, challenges this entirely. The exhibits came from years of cooperation between nine artists and leading quantum research labs. They don't just reflect scientific ideas but also offer new understandings that directly contribute to research.

The exhibition originated in physicist Silke Weinfurtner's "Gravity Laboratory", where she uses water or superfluid helium (超流氦) to model black holes and the early universe—systems too distant for direct experiments. Exploring similar systems gives Weinfurtner concrete insights into their behaviour as the underlying mathematics is the same.

In one artwork, An Early Universe, artist Alistair McClymont takes similar fluid systems and makes them even more palpable. A large bass (低音) speaker placed in a dark room disturbs a dish of water as it sweeps through low frequencies. Next, a flashing light projects mathematical patterns created by the sound waves onto a wall. Because our bodies are mostly water, the bass shakes inside us, too. As the patterns shift from order to chaos, you feel an unusual sensation mirroring the sight. Moreover, cooperating with McClymont led Weinfurtner to find new light-based methods that use flashing lights to measure fluid systems.

Other works on display also seek to make the hard-to-grasp perceivable. The Quantum Lens, for example, a mixed-reality experience, explores quantum ideas that go against common sense. Projections inside a VR headset allow users to make sense of how many possible worlds may collapse into the one we experience. Another work, Ringdown by Conrad Shawcross, explores two black holes' final moments using bronze bells and shaking metal bars. The mysterious sounds bring us closer to these events, mirroring how scientists now study gravitational wave data.

All of this highlights the role that observers play in both art and science. The organizer of Cosmic Titans Ulrike Kuchner said, "Art challenges you to take a position. As an audience, you complete the artwork with your own memories, your own emotions, and your own personal context—something science rarely does."

Fundamental physics especially tries to remove away the personal and offer an objective perspective. Yet recent advances into the foundations of quantum physics suggest that reality isn't absolute and objective, but rather comes about through negotiating the perspectives of different observers.

Ultimately, as Cosmic Titans reminds us, there are deeper truths underlying science and art, not least that objective reality is a false belief.

( )4. What does the word "palpable" underlined in Paragraph 4 probably mean?

A. Predictable. B. Adaptable.

C. Manageable. D. Observable.

( )5. What can we learn from Cosmic Titans?

A. Art is key to scientific discoveries.

B. Art can help clarify complex scientific ideas.

C. Science plays a guiding role in artistic creation.

D. Scientific research is more reliable than artistic exploration.

( )6. What can be inferred from the passage?

A. What we call objective reality may not exist.

B. Scientists view art as a visual tool for testing theories.

C. Observers' roles are fully considered in scientific progress.

D. Quantum physics values personal experience over scientific data.

( )7. What does the author mainly do in this passage?

A. Make a comparison.

B. Predict a trend.

C. Promote an event.

D. Illustrate an idea.

When you go to concerts, you expect your favourite musician to perform amazingly on stage. But you may have noticed something curious that most musicians don't just play with their fingers. They also involve body movements that fit the song's beat or dance following the music. 1. _____ The facial expressions musicians show when playing may seem strange or crazy to an outsider, but all that pulling faces might actually serve a purpose.

Firstly, playing a musical instrument usually requires intense focus and concentration. 2. _____ Their facial expressions can be a demonstration of the intense emotions and physical effort that go hand in hand with the musical performance. They're often subconscious—in fact, many of us will pull strange faces when we're deeply involved in an activity we care about.

3. _____ Musicians have a strong emotional connection with the music they perform. They often use their facial expressions to express the mood and interpretation of the music, which creates a more engaging musical experience. While facial expressions may not directly make someone a better musician, they might contribute to the overall artistry of the music.

Performing live music is a rather stressful experience, so it could be that the performer is expressing those nerves through their face—biting the bottom lip, for example. Luckily, nerves will often go away soon after a musician starts performing. 4. _____

The facial expressions obviously to some extent express the performer's inner world. Another interesting thing is that making facial expressions can have a physiological impact on the musician's performance. Some research suggests that certain facial movements can activate specific muscles and improve muscle harmonization. 5. _____ However, it's important to note that this relationship is still not well understood, and the extent to which facial expressions directly impact musical competence is a subject of ongoing investigation.

A. When you're really focused, you don't care about the outside world.

B. Among them the part of the body that best exhibits this is obviously the face.

C. They likely won't be the main cause for those strange faces throughout a performance.

D. Such effects are particularly helpful in controlling muscles when playing an instrument.

E. Facial expressions can also help musicians communicate emotions and artistic expression.

F. Musicians are often overcome with emotion from the music itself or the reaction of the crowd.

G. Musicians often enter a state of "flow", where they become completely absorbed in the music they're creating.

A [2023·北师大附中高一期中]

The question of whether it is possible to dissociate the artist from their work has been debated for a long time. Even though positive critical reviews about an artist's behaviour can improve their artistic accomplishments, people should treat artists as individuals who have lived apart from their work.

One of the reasons is that even artists have shortcomings. Like any other human being, an artist can err, and we cannot be severely judgemental of every person that falls into error. Cancel culture with endless criticism is concerned more with how we should disregard the artists when they make mistakes than with how their weaknesses can be used by the artists to create art that is unique.

Perhaps Kevin Hart's words support this thought. He asks, "When did we get to a point where life was supposed to be perfect? Where people were supposed to operate perfectly all the time?" When people start seeing artists as human beings, they'll see them for who they are and review their behaviour not on the basis of their art but on the basis of their humanity.

It should be also noted that there are works of art that are inspired by the artist's experience. For example, the themes in the Harry Potter books are so connected with J. K. Rowling's wicked world view that it is virtually impossible to distinguish the two from each other. Since canceling artists based on their world view would mean the reception to their art will suffer, artists become tense and unwilling to express themselves, which will kill creativity, eventually leading to the death of art. Comedians, singers or painters who should be integrating contemporary issues with their works become boring, and art stops functioning as the social mirror it ought to be.

An artist who makes mistakes still has art with intrinsic (内在的) value, benefiting entire communities or cultures. For instance, when Kendrick Lamar launched his album and frequently used the F-slur in one of his songs, there was much-heated discussion. He was entirely mistaken in using the F-slur, but as an artist, he still had a wide-reaching impact on society. Similarly, one can respect the late Michael Jackson because of how he impacted pop music and the inclusion of black musicians in mainstream media despite his personal weaknesses, opinions, world views and associations.

While these artists may engage in their terrible behaviour, the art they produce today may serve as an example for others to produce outstanding work in the future. Some would refer to this process as a cycle. Good art should, therefore, be judged due to its value and not the value of the artist.

( )1. Which would Kevin Hart probably agree with?

A. People should perform perfectly all the time.

B. Artists' shortcomings might be their inspiration.

C. If artists have weaknesses, we'd better cancel them.

D. Artists should be evaluated based on their humanity.

( )2. Why will "cancel culture" lead to the death of art?

A. Artists will be unwilling to create any artwork.

B. Artists will stop concerning themselves with contemporary issues.

C. Artists will lose their desire for expression and creativity.

D. Artworks are unavoidably inspired by artists' experiences.

( )3. How can an artist with mistakes benefit others?

A. The artist may make some new words popular.

B. The artist's opinions may provoke heated discussion.

C. The artist will benefit entire communities or cultures.

D. The artist's art may give others ideas of artistic creation.
